Seven Cases of Vimalakīrti

The Seventh Case: Silence*

Entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two

I

Today, I would like to discuss the last of the seven cases selected from the Vimalakīrti Sūtra. This case concerns the "Dharma Gate of Not-Two," expounded in the "Chapter on the Entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two" (Chapter 9). This [concept] is central to the Vimalakīrti Sūtra—so much so that merely mentioning the text immediately evokes the Dharma Gate of Not-Two, as it constitutes the very core of the scripture.

The Dharma Gate of Not-Two teaches that what is ordinarily regarded as two is, in fact, not two, but "one." About thirty-three such [pairs] are discussed in this chapter. However, this [principle] is not limited to any [fixed] number such as thirty-three; from a contemporary standpoint, countless other dualities could also be included.

Upon reflection, [we realize that] there are indeed many instances each of which treats two opposites as a single pair. In some cases, the opposites seem mutually contradictory; in others, they are not necessarily in conflict, but simply juxtaposed. There are countless such pairs in which two components are combined as one. From the standpoint of values, for example, we have good and evil, beauty and ugliness, truth and falsehood, right and wrong. From the standpoint of existence, we have origination and cessation, life and death, one and many, particular and universal, being and nothingness, and so forth. Indeed, the possibilities are limitless. The Vimalakīrti Sūtra specifically discusses thirty-three such [pairs].

* From Hisamatsu Shin'ichi Chosakushū (Collection of Works), Vol. VI (Risōsha, Tokyo, 1973; revised edition, Hōzōkan, Kyoto, 1994), pp. 173–183. The Japanese text previously appeared in the monograph Yuima Shichisoku (Seven Cases of Vimalakirti) (FAS Society, Kyoto, 1960). Originally, it was a series of teikō talks delivered during retreats around 1955.

Thus, what is normally regarded as two is, in truth, not two, but one—or, rather, not-two. This is what is called the Dharma Gate of Not-Two. However, this [phrase] does not mean reasoning that "one" necessarily lies at the root of "two." You don't merely start from the standpoint of "two" and assume or infer there must be "one" underlying it. Rather, one must directly, practically, and experientially enter into the very depth of "two"; only then can it be realized that "two," just as it is, is "one." Therefore, it is not that "one" exists somewhere beyond "two."

When I say "beyond" here, I do not mean it [in the sense] that, through [concepts] such as "external transcendence" or "internal transcendence," one asserts that there necessarily must be "one." It does not exist, so to speak, in the mode of sollen [(ought to be)]. Rather, "one" manifests itself when you truly transcend "two" and wholly become that "one" yourself. Thus, instead of standing on the side of "two" and assuming "one" as something necessary, you transcend "two" and leap into "one"—only then does "one" become present. Moreover, because "one" is now "here," it follows that two is "over there"; this might seem to suggest that "two" exists apart from "one," but that is not the case. On the contrary, at that point, "two" has already become "not-two."

II

The Dharma Gate of Not-Two concerns the actual entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two; it does not concern the mere assumption or conception of non-duality. When you enter the Dharma Gate of Not-Two, it is what is original to you and what is immediately present. In other words, "not-two" then manifests itself—it is "awakened to" or realized. If, at that point, that to which one awakens and the one who awakens were two, then it would still be a matter of "two," rather than "not-two." Therefore, unless awakening or realization is such that there no longer exists [the opposition between] the one who awakens and that to which one awakens, it cannot truly be called the Dharma Gate of Not-Two.

When I speak of awakening or realization, you might imagine that there is an "I" who realizes or awakens—that is, that there exists a Dharma Gate to which one awakens and an "I" who awakens to it. Yet that cannot be called the Dharma Gate of Not-Two. In true awakening, the awakener and that to which one awakens—the subject and the object, the knower and the known—become completely one. However, if anything remains apart from that oneness, then duality still persists. It follows that, in addition to the awakening that manifests, there remains something that is not awakening—so that "two" still remains. But true awakening has no inside or outside whatsoever; within it there is neither inside nor outside. Furthermore, there is nothing outside it, nor anything within it.

If we continue to think of something opposed to it as existing externally, then even when we speak of ultimate "not-two," we inevitably think of that ultimate "not-two" and of that which is not "not-two." Proceeding in this way through [conceptual] thinking will never arrive at true "not-two." When we inquire into what true "not-two" is, precisely because we determine it as "true," it inevitably stands opposed to what is "not true." This is, so to speak, the very fate of discriminative thought. Proceeding in this way, the Dharma Gate of Not-Two can never [truly] manifest; it inevitably collapses back into two. For this very reason we now arrive at a [realm] that can in no way be expressed in words or reached by thought.

III

When we look at the scripture, we find that Vimalakīrti asks the bodhisattvas present:

> "What is the bodhisattvas' entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two?"*

In response, each of the bodhisattvas expounds, in turn, [their own understanding of] what is meant by the Dharma Gate of Not-Two.

For example, at the beginning it is written:

> Among those gathered there was a bodhisattva named Dharmavikurvaṇa [Ch. Self-abiding in the Dharma], who said: "Virtuous Ones, arising and ceasing are [regarded as] two. Yet all beings are originally unborn, and therefore they never cease. The attainment of insight into this unborn nature of all beings is the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two."

* Note by tradukkato: All scriptural quotations in this lecture are taken from Kumārajīva's Chinese translation of the Vimalakīrti Sūtra.

> The bodhisattva Śrīguṇḍha [Ch. Guardian of the Three Virtues] said: "'I' and 'mine' are [regarded as] two. Because there is an 'I', there is also 'mine'. [But] since, [fundamentally,] there is no 'I,' there is no 'mine' either. This is called the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two."

In this way, each bodhisattva, according to their own realization, explains what it means to enter the Dharma Gate of Not-Two. Since Vimalakīrti asked the bodhisattvas present what the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two is, [the scripture introduces] each one['s response] with the words, "[Such-and-such a bodhisattva] said…"—that is, each gives his own explanation.

The first to speak is Dharmavikurvaṇa Bodhisattva, who expresses the view that, ordinarily, arising and ceasing are [regarded as] two. We might also call this "life and death," yet it is a [pair of] mutually opposed concepts. To say that [something] "arises" is to imply the opposite of "ceases"; to say that [something] "ceases" is to imply the opposite of "arises." Ordinarily, these are seen as two, but [in truth] they are not two. Why are they not two? Because all beings are originally unborn (unarising); since they do not [truly] arise, they do not [truly] cease. In other words, all beings are unarising and unceasing—thus, arising and ceasing are not two, but one. From the standpoint of this "one," both arising and ceasing return to the "one". Therefore, to regard them as two is mistaken; and when one realizes this truth, one attains insight into the unborn, unarising nature of all beings, which enables one to enter the Dharma Gate of Not-Two. This is how [the first bodhisattva] explains.

Next, the bodhisattva Śrīguṇḍha says: Ordinarily, we think that "I" and "mine" are two. Yet, all beings are without an "I," without self, and therefore there is likewise no "mine." Thus, "I" and "mine" are not two, but one—this is how he explains it.

Among these [teachings], I will highlight some that are especially thought-provoking to us. For example:

> The bodhisattva Puṣya said: "Good and evil are [regarded as] two. If one neither > gives rise to thoughts of good nor of evil, and attains the realm where [all is] formless, that is the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two."

What [this bodhisattva] means is this: Ordinarily, we must speak of good and evil as two. However, if we do not give rise to either good or evil [thoughts], then there are no forms or characteristics of good and evil. Thus, by attaining the realm where [all is] formless, we can enter the Dharma Gate of Not-Two.

> The bodhisattva Siṃha [Ch. Lion] said: "Sin and merit are [regarded as] two. When one penetrates that the nature of sin is not different from that of merit and, with adamantine wisdom, attains this [truth] without fail—being bound by nothing and seeking no liberation—this is the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two."

That is, sin and merit—one might also say virtue and fault, or guilt and innocence—are usually [regarded as] two. But if, with adamantine wisdom, we attain [the root-source] where such distinctions have not yet arisen—there, there is neither bondage nor liberation. Such is what it means to enter the Dharma-Gate of Not-Two.

Then the sutra goes on to discuss such pairs as "mundane and supramundane," "life-death and nirvāṇa," "I and no-I," "light [i.e., wisdom] and ignorance," "form and the emptiness of form," and so on—explaining how, in truth, each pair is not two but one.

Furthermore, it says: "the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Community are [regarded as] two"—though they are in fact three. Here, "the Community" refers to the Saṅgha. It is said that these three are [in truth] one. Indeed, they are inseparable. Likewise, [the sutra] says that the "three deeds"—of body, speech, and mind—are not [truly] three, but one in essence.

Then it speaks of "nirvāṇa and the world," which means the same as "nirvāṇa and life-death."

> [The bodhisattva Ratnamudrāhasta (Ch. The Hand Forming the Jewel-Mudrā) said:] "Delighting in nirvāṇa and not delighting in the world is [to see] two. If one neither delights in nirvāṇa nor turns away from the world, there do not exist the two. Why is this so? If there were bondage, there would be liberation; but if there were no bondage from the beginning, who would seek liberation? Where there is neither bondage nor liberation, there is neither delighting nor rejecting. This is the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two."

Indeed, this is precisely so.

IV

In this way, all those things that are ordinarily spoken of as two—or even as many—have been shown to be, in truth, not many but one. Finally, Mañjuśrī—who has led the bodhisattvas there, and who, at the Buddha's command, visits Vimalakīrti to ask about his illness—is directly addressed by the eminent householder,* who asks anew:

> "What is the bodhisattva's entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two?"

Mañjuśrī gives his reply, and here we come to the most crucial point of this entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two:

> "In my view, with respect to all phenomena, there is no speech, no explanation, no indication, no cognition, and freedom from all questions and answers. This is the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two."

That is to say, explanation and discourse can never escape duality. However detailed they may be, after all they remain within [the realm of] "two." Mañjuśrī takes the matter a step further and replies: "As I see it, with respect to all things, there is no speech, no explanation, and freedom from all questions and answers." This is a statement of the ultimate: that it cannot be explained. The Dharma Gate of

* Note by tradukkato: According to the text, it was not Vimalakīrti who posed the following question, but those bodhisattvas who had presented their own understandings before Mañjuśrī.

Not-Two cannot be spoken of—for to speak of it is already to fall into "two." If there were no two-ness, there could be no explanation. In the very act of explaining, discrimination is already at work.

Since explanation cannot occur without discrimination, the fact that the "two" are [in truth] "one" means that "not-two" can no longer be expressed or indicated in words. It follows that we cannot consciously grasp or comprehend it. In reality, this is so: there is neither inside nor outside, utterly beyond all discrimination, wholly one. Therefore, it cannot be spoken of. To speak of it is already to make it "two." To speak of it is already to introduce discrimination into it.

This is why texts such as The Awakening of Faith in the Mahāyāna say that true suchness is beyond all forms of speech and explanation, calling it "free from speech." Because it is beyond words, nothing can be said of it—and it is even impossible to say that "nothing can be said." To say "nothing can be said" would already be to have spoken of it. This is precisely the point Mañjuśrī makes.

It is often said in Zen that Śākyamuni Buddha declared: "For forty-nine years I did not utter a single word." This saying is explained as follows: for forty-nine years the Buddha preached in many ways, and yet in truth he never uttered a single word. This "not speaking a word" is in fact the true preaching, for only thus is the teaching truly "not-two." Thus Mañjuśrī expounded the ultimate meaning of [the entrance into the Dharma Gate of] Not-Two. But was Vimalakīrti truly satisfied with this answer of Mañjuśrī?

V

Here lies the profound depth of Vimalakīrti. Even for us, when we engage in actual practice, this is an exceptionally difficult point. It is precisely here that Mañjuśrī has not yet thoroughly penetrated [the matter]. Mañjuśrī too cannot yet be said to have entered the Dharma Gate of Not-Two. At this juncture, Vimalakīrti* is pressing Mañjuśrī to present the direct point of the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-

* See the tradukkato's note above, in Section IV.

Two, rather than asking him for an explanation. But when Vimalakīrti* asks, "How do you understand it?" Mañjuśrī is ensnared in the net of words and ends up declaring that it cannot be spoken of. This is precisely what Vimalakīrti would never approve.

The approach of Zen is similar: it does not seek explanations, but demands the direct point. It looks to see how you can present that direct point. As the text says "freedom from all questions and answers," Zen dialogue differs radically from ordinary debate; explanation is what it most strongly rejects. Zen dialogue is not a philosophical disputation [based on conceptual] discrimination. Philosophy can go only at most as far as the point reached by Mañjuśrī:

> "with respect to all phenomena, there is no speech, no explanation, no indication, no cognition, and freedom from all questions and answers. This is the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two."

This is indeed so. Nevertheless, it is not sufficient to enter the Dharma Gate of Not-Two. Thus [the text continues]:

> "We have each expressed our own understanding. Now, Virtuous One, you should speak. What is the bodhisattva's entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two?"

At this point Mañjuśrī, having heard all the others, turns to Vimalakīrti and says: "We have each presented our views on the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two. Now, Vimalakīrti, please show us what this is." But it is so characteristic of Vimalakīrti: he then, in person, directly manifests the very entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two.

The text says:

> Then Vimalakīrti remained silent, without uttering a word.

This silence is not an explanation of the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two, nor is it simply a refusal to speak because of its freedom from speech and explanation. Rather, [the very matter] of entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two itself is laid bare, cast forth openly, filling the whole world. At this moment, there is no world apart from Vimalakīrti; the entire world is Vimalakīrti. Silence here does not simply mean keeping quiet. In this silence, there is no distinction between silence and non-silence. If such a distinction existed, it would still be a "two-ness," and not "not-two." Only silence without the opposition of silence and non-silence can be called the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two. But what kind of silence is this, in which silence and non-silence are not two? This direct point cannot be explained; yet silence does not mean merely remaining wordless.

The true entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two is utterly free and spontaneous. This silence is like ten thousand thunders—like what is called "one silence like ten thousand peals of thunder"—giving rise to all speech and explanations, unobstructed and spontaneous. To remain fixed in silence is not true silence. Every place, every time must be silence. All speech and explanations, all acts—every one of them is silence. Thus [the text says]:

> Mañjuśrī praised him, saying: "Excellent, excellent! To be without letters, words, or speech—this is indeed the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two."

Mañjuśrī thus praises Vimalakīrti's silence. Yet even this praise is no more than mere praise. At this point, we ourselves must ask: "What is the entrance into the Dharma Gate of Not-Two?"

With this, I conclude my verbal explanation of the seven cases of Vimalakīrti. But whether this explanation has been speech or non-speech, I myself do not know.
